This manuscript addresses a critical issue in cancer research—balancing the efforts and resources between cancer prevention and cure. By exploring both strategies, it provides valuable insights into how scientific research can be better allocated to address the growing global cancer burden. The discussion on prevention strategies is especially timely, as early interventions have the potential to reduce the incidence of cancer, saving lives and healthcare costs. Additionally, the manuscript emphasizes the need for continued innovation in treatment, ensuring that even when prevention fails, effective cures are available for patients. This dual focus enhances our understanding of cancer control and informs both public health policy and future research directions
